

Find the correct words.

FILL THE GAPS

The History of School Uniforms

Source: www.history-a2z.com
<https://www.history-a2z.com/the-history-of-school-uniforms/>

outfit love-hate catching knee-high public upside former disputes conformity stylish

People have always had a _____ relationship with school uniforms. The _____ of having a school uniform is that it creates equality and saves time getting ready in the morning. The downside is that there is a lot less room for self-expression (plus, wearing the same thing every day is pretty boring). But what brought this overall _____ to schools all around the world?

School uniforms first appeared in the UK in the 16th century. They were worn by the students of the London Christ Hospital School in 1552. Surprisingly, the uniforms weren't very different than what we see in other schools today and included blue coats and _____ yellow socks. Not exactly _____ under today's standards, but the design hasn't changed much over the years and the students of the school have been wearing a pretty similar _____ to this day.

After _____ on in England, school uniforms started spreading around Europe, and from there to other countries around the world. The practice is most common in schools around East Asia and Africa. The issue of school uniforms in state schools became a burning issue in 1996 when _____ President Bill Clinton promoted it. He addressed the matter, speaking of how fashion choices sometimes turn into violent _____ among school students and how this must be stopped. In a matter of two years, about 25% of the students in the US _____ education system were either wearing uniforms or considering it.

Teacher's key

The History of School Uniforms

Source: www.history-a2z.com

<https://www.history-a2z.com/the-history-of-school-uniforms/>

People have always had a love-hate relationship with school uniforms. The upside of having a school uniform is that it creates equality and saves time getting ready in the morning. The downside is that there is a lot less room for self-expression (plus, wearing the same thing every day is pretty boring). But what brought this overall conformity to schools all around the world?

School uniforms first appeared in the UK in the 16th century. They were worn by the students of the London Christ Hospital School in 1552. Surprisingly, the uniforms weren't very different than what we see in other schools today and included blue coats and knee-high yellow socks. Not exactly stylish under today's standards, but the design hasn't changed much over the years and the students of the school have been wearing a pretty similar outfit to this day.

After catching on in England, school uniforms started spreading around Europe, and from there to other countries around the world. The practice is most common in schools around East Asia and Africa. The issue of school uniforms in state schools became a burning issue in 1996 when former President Bill Clinton promoted it. He addressed the matter, speaking of how fashion choices sometimes turn into violent disputes among school students and how this must be stopped. In a matter of two years, about 25% of the students in the US public education system were either wearing uniforms or considering it.